DR. CHANNING'S PREACHING.—The following description of the late Dr. Channing, and of his preaching, we take from the last number of Mr. G. W. Curtis's brilliant novel of "Trumps," in Harper's Weekly:

Harper's Weekly:

"When our friends entered the church, a slow, solemn voluntary was playing upon the organ. The congregation sat quietly in the pews. Chairs, and benches were brought to accommodate the increasing throng. Presently the house was full. The bustle and distraction of entering were over—there was nothing heard but the organ.

"In a few moments a slight man, wrapped in a black silk gown, slowly ascended the pulpit stairs, and, before seating himself, stood for a moment looking down at the congregation. His face otack silk gown, slowly ascended the pulpit stairs, and, before seating himself, stood for a moment fooking down at the congregation. His face was small and thin, and pale; but there was once light, an earnest, spiritual sweetness in the eyes—the irradiation of an anxious soul—as they surveyed the paople. After a ley moments the music stopped. There was perfect clients in the crowded church. Then, moving five a student to the desit, the prescher, is a voice that was in singular harmony with the expression of his face, began to spart a hyper of the face, the prescher of the face, the prescher of the face, being and falling with particle had retained to the colors. With better hopes be filled."

"When he had read it and sat down again, Hope Wayne felt as if a religious service had already been performed.

"The simplicity and fervor and long-drawn melody with which he had read the hymn apparently inspired the choir with sympathy, and after a few notes from the organ they began to sing an old families time. It was taken up by the congregation until the church troubled with the sound, and the saunternestin the street outside involuntarily ceased lengthing and talking, and, touched by some indefinable association, cained their bate and stoud here headed in the saulight,
